1 SHALL BE WITH THEE.
 I have a footstep in the hall,
 I see a shadow on the wall—
 A woman shadow dark and tall—
 A voiceless shadow—this is all.
 No gentle footfall near the door,
 Thrills to my heart across the floor,
 And I am weary thinking of
 That music I shall have no more—
 That tender music, soft and sweet—
 The melody of coming feet.
 I cry, and echo sends the call
 Back to my heart—and this is all.
 I feel a soft hand on my head,
 A hand whose touch no room overleaves
 With tears the tale that the lilies told
 Over the white bosoms of the Dead,
 And I can chide while memories fail
 The perfumery o'er me—like this is all.
 I feel the rhythm and the rhyme
 Of thy dear life keep sweetest time
 With God's sweet notes, and crowding in
 To tell me of thy love and thine.
 I feel I can hear thee—feel thy breath,
 In the still air which answerseth
 With lightest kiss whom'er I call,
 Mid-words for thee—and this is all.
 I cannot hear this in the hall,
 Nor see thy shadow on the wall—
 Yet when the voice of God shall call
 I shall be with thee—this is all.

SPINNING AND WEAVING AT LAKE NYASSA.

A correspondent writes to the  Glasgow Evening Times:—A member of the Livingstonian Mission staff, who went out to superintend the manufacturing department, thus graphically describes the primitive spinning process in this primitive people's country which inhabits that interesting territory—"Some of the natives spin pretty fairly, but slowly. Some of them have an instrument like the barrel of a pair of scissors, with wooded spindles about six inches long at each end; they take the cotton in the right hand, twist it round one end of the spindle two or three times, then fasten it in the barrel, and draw the thread with the fingers and thumb of the left hand, send it round with surprising speed, while guiding the cotton with the right hand. Others again have just a long stick 18 inches in length, with something like a cork at the end to balance. They twine the cotton with their fingers, then tie it on to the stick, which they hang perpendicular and bid it rotate by starting the stick. The latter is the slowest, but it certainly makes the finest thread. The first method will produce (at least what I have seen) cotton yarn from Nos. 10 to 16, the latter mode from Nos. 20 to 30. The style of weaving is slow, and the cloth is imperfect. It is very simple. Two men work at one loom. When warping they walk round to pests about two feet apart. The thread after that will get as much as to the web. They then take and draw the one half through the heddles with only one doip, the other half is thrown no heddles at all; they then get their warp fastened at both ends to cross sticks which they fasten to a pin at each end. They put on some green stitching stuff on the cross sticks to keep the warp from slipping. Then they begin to weave. Lifting up the heddles, then the cross-stick is lifted up by pulling forward a sort of lease rod, about two inches thick, which when turned on its edges raises the shed. This is done by one of the men; the other sits with a stick, about a yard in length, on which is wound the wett. When the sheds are raised he puts this through, and knocks up the shed. Then he calls the other to call them, and call them wrought, they draw the pins behind, roll on the cloth, and with the pins again, and so on till the 'web's' out."

Those who read the memoir of Grimaldi will remember that in 1803 a brother of that famous clown disappeared in a most mysterious manner. One November evening in the year before last, the late Drury Lane, had been called by the prompter, and was passing from the green-room to the stage, when a messenger informed him that two gentlemen were waiting at the stage-door to see him. Grimaldi recognised his brother—his only brother—who had gone to sea years before, and had asked him to go to the office and read a letter which Grimaldi, as soon as the first surprise was over, "Mr. Wroughton is there; he'll be delighted to see you." The brothers were hurrying away, when the friend, whose presence they had quite forgotten in their emotion, said, "Then I'll wish you good night!" "Good night!" said the other, and then he took the friend by the hand. "I'll see you another time." "Yes," replied his friend, "at 10, mind." A friend, to whom he had not introduced his brother in any way, departed, and they went upon the stage together, when Grimaldi introduced his brother to Powell, Bannister, Wroughton, and many others who were in the room. Then Grimaldi introduced the brother to all the friends that he had a large sum of money with him, had arrived in London only a few hours' previously, and was extremely anxious to see his mother. "If you wait until I have dressed, I will take you to her," said Grimaldi; and he went to his room, leaving his brother on the stage. The brother, who was not long, left the theatre by the stage door, and, after paying a visit to a friend at a house in the neighbourhood, went away in the direction of Duke Street. He was not seen or heard of again. No stone was left unturned in the endeavour to clear up the mystery. Grimaldi set out foot by foot to inquire after him, and could not shake off the kindness of his friends' proposals to advise. The police officers were paid to search all London through, and endeavour to gain some information, if it were only of the lost man's death. Every thing was tried by the family, and by many very powerful friends, whom the distressing news had brought to the theatre, and who tried to trace the object of their regret and labour. But it was all in vain. The sailor was seen no more. Recently a brief paragraph in an American paper recorded the death at Knoxville, in Tennessee, of a person described as an American sailor, Thomas Grimaldi, who is recognised as the brother of the famous clown, who died about the same years. The name of Grimaldi being very uncommon, and the famous clown's brother having been entered at the age of eight on board an East Indian man, from which he swam to a man-of-war lying near by, never again to be seen by any relative except on the New York Herald in 1853. The New York Herald that the person of the old sailor a solution of the mystery described by Dickens might be found. Inquiries were accordingly made, and the result has led many to believe that the brother of Grimaldi, so far from being murdered, slain, or strangled and massed great wealth in America, had been a sailor, and had just died of his own son. We prowled on several hours, sometimes by the sea-side, sometimes inland, and finally managed to get lost, which is a feat that requires talent in Bermuda. I hid on the shore, they were No. 7's when I started, but they were not more than half an hour from me. We walked two hours in the shoes after that, before we reached the beach. Doubtless I could have the reader's sympathy for the asking. Many people have never been to the headcure or the loothache, and I am sure of them myself; but everybody has worn the shoes for two or three hours, and known the luxury of taking off the shoes at last. It was a relief that swept up and obscured all former annoyances. Few of us will ever forget, as I do, how much we enjoyed the shoes. I was an exquisite here, we were married once upon a time. I was a callow, bashful cub, I took a place with an unsentimental country girl to a comedy of the night. I had known her a day; she seemed divine: I wore my new boots. At the end of the first half-hour she said, "Why do you fidget?" I said, "I don't know." She said, "Then I put my attention there and kept it there. At the end of another half hour she said, "Why do you say, 'Yes, oh yes!'" "Ha, ha, oh, certainly, very true!" to evade anything I say, when half the time those entirely irrelevant answers come into my mind, and explained that she had been thinking of the end of another half hour she said, "Please, why do you grin so steadfastly at vacancy, and yet look so sad." I explained that I always did when I was reflecting. An hour passed, when she turned and contemplated me with her earnest eyes and said, "You are not crying all the time?" I explained that I

Not on whit too soon the Legislative Assembly has passed an Act for the protection of the more useful varieties of birds of the country, both indigenous and exotic, as well as of such species of the former as, from their rarity or beauty, or from their utility to man, are in danger of extermination. If such a measure could have been enforced less than a generation ago, the Globe remarks, it is more than probable that remarkable bird, the moon-capture of a living specimen of which would rank as a worthy parallel to the capture of the redoubtable sea-serpent—would have existed. The fate of the report current among the Maoris, that the moa might actually be found existing in the almost impenetrable forests in the interior of the country, would have been a discovery now generally regarded as hopeless, even if it should have proved a reality. The bird, which is in danger of the destruction of the bird, which is not mentioned in the schedule of birds requiring protection, is one of the feathered tribes upon whose peculiarities still exist in New Zealand, that it would be a blot on our boasted civilization to see disappear before its advance the apteryx, or wingless bird, the habits most peculiar, resembling those of a quadruped than of any feathered biped, is almost extinct; and a species of nocturnal parrot, the "kaloupek" of the natives, which nibbles the grass and roams the plants more like a rabbit than a bird, has been hunted down, notwithstanding the fact that it is never seen during the day, as now confined to the island of Moutohora, some 10 miles from the South Island. About 20 years ago the last known specimen of the water rail, the Noronina mantelli, was hunted alive by some sealers in the neighbourhood of Dusky Bay, where its beautiful plumage of glossy bronze green, with a black head and breast and white tail, and its long red beak and feet, were the more legitimate of the "parson bird," whose powers of mimicry and articulate speech rival those of the mocking bird itself, is one of the few varieties of which any number can still be met with. There are many varieties, such as the fruit-eating pigeon, the crested shrike, and several species of cormorants, and to whose preservation the Government has exposed the same danger of extermination more completely than the mere curiosity which prompts the destruction of the nonedible species. Even those kinds of birds which have been introduced into the Colony from the Mother-country on account of their value as insect destroyers are included in the list of birds requiring legislation for protection, the destructive propensities of many.

standing in the open. A shot fired in his direction, and the shikaree dove the bull forward, a terror (who kept running at the bull when running back to his master) at the time succeeded in drawing the beast to the right spot, and with an "o" of last hope the man settled the grand old fellow on the ground. The shikaree then fired a shot at the ferret to this capture is, that about two years ago, within a mile of the same place, a tiger was killed by a man. Mr. Phillips fired at a bull bison, he believes to be the same animal he had killed. "His shot then missed his mark, struck one of the horses." The animal was a most magnificent specimen of his kind. On one of the horns he had the mark of a bullet. Mr. Phillips m the animal while still warm, and laid down a "90 lead ball." The means of the horns are extraordinary.
